technology within the reach of anyone interested in interpreting and preserving our ways of life for future generations. He discusses how to select the proper video format, how to set up and use video equipment, how to record oral history interviews, and how to expand interpretation with video. Three appendixes illustrate the equipment available and include price ranges. Certainly a useful guide in the modern age of television and video.

Public Works History in the United States: A Guide to the Literature, ed. Suellen M. Hoy and Michael C. Robinson. (Nashville: American Association of State & Local History, 1982. pp. 512, index, $49.00 cloth.)

Over 5,000 entries document the historical development of planning, engineering, and administration; irrigation; flood control; roads, streets, and highways; urban mass transportation; energy; and parks and recreation. This reference work should be most useful to public historians, planners, architectural and engineering firms, and for all interested in an understanding of American expansion and technical growth. This is the most comprehensive bibliography published to date on a very relevant topic.

Westward in Eden: The Public Lands and the Conservation Movement, by William K. Wyant. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982. pp. 536, photographs, notes, bibliography, index, $24.50 cloth.)

This is essential reading for Americans in the 1980s who are concerned about the use (and subsequent abuse) of our public lands. The author, long-time reporter for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch in Washington, has made an exhaustive search of public documents and extensive field reporting, to present his case against the exploitation of our natural resources—the only remains of our frontier—the land. By tracing the history of American land settlement and conservation practices and focusing on events in the 1970s, the author provides a setting for discussion of today's land and environmental issues. Woven throughout this story are the lives of such men as Teddy Roosevelt, Stephen T. Mather (first director of the National Park Service), Albert B. Fall, Carl Schurz, Cecil D. Andrus, and Morris K. Udall. He presents a good assessment of the current so-called "Sagebrush Rebellion" whereby public lands in the western states would be placed under state jurisdiction, where special interest groups can attain their ends even more freely than under federal control.
