

WINTER NOTES

Tammy Newcomb

The photographs included here were taken on my grandparents' farm outside of Nodine, Minnesota. The town is comprised of a church, a school, a general store, a bar (that recently closed) and a few houses. The remaining residents live on the family farms that surround this town. Most of the farms have been in the family for generations.

As I was growing up, this farm was part of my collective "home." I grew up fifteen miles away from it and spent a huge part of my childhood on it. When I became an adult and moved away, it became a strong anchor and reference point. It was where some of the most important people in my life existed. After my grandparents died, the making of these photographs was an attempt to hold on to some of what this place had been to me.
