TREES THAT LOOK LIKE RAIN

Stephen Haven

A leaf, a green leaf's not one color, one side's slightly darker, I say one's lighter. The wind flips it first one way then the other before the storm clouds break.

And the tree on which it hangs with many other leaves looks like rain. It thrashes its long branches like Medusa in a rage. That tree has nothing to say but says it anyway: first waves of light then darker waves of wind pass through the leaves and later that foliage turns brown.

If the tree doesn't mean anything by that, I still take it as fact: when trees look like rain they show the underside of all green things.

Or so it seemed that day walking along the river with storm clouds rolling in. All the trees there looked like rain. I have no regrets. I won't see you again.
