

To Bukowski, #44

“it’s a shockingly
nice-looking bird” she said & the old man sat up & said “that’s what I used to think” “before your wife turned on you?” “yes” she stepped to the window unlocked it raised it 2 inches the old man didn’t move so she raised it 6 more the parakeet shivered blinked let its feathers settle hopped onto the gritty side of the sill she sat beside the old man her hand found his titanium knee “you sure we should let it sit there?” he asked the parakeet dropped itself to the strip of desert beside the dry-rotted siding & the birdshit-stained lot it hopped again then again then stood in the dark like a small faded statue of St. Jude

“gonna get pecked to hell by those crows in that olive tree” the old man said “those crows” she said carefully “are gone”