POST-TROUBLES POET

"tourism, not terrorism"

You laugh when I tell you I'm on the bus— Allan's Tours, Allan himself giving the lowdown on the Lower Shankill Road, the tunnel between the courthouse and Crumlin Jail. Neither of us has ever been down here, this hauled-across -the-hot-coals bit of Belfast, black terraces caught in the shadow of Divis. No chance to get out and read the names on the Peace Wall, no hop-on-hop-off here: Allan has other plans—Titanic Quarter, up to Stormont, all the C.S. Lewis/George Best grandstanding.

But I've not shaken off the pitch-black murals, I who do not wake in the mornings with a head full of beatings, barbed wire, Molotovs. I do not wake with it, the virulent ideas that rented out these salted walls, these pavements, this thick red-pebbled road.

In his garden at Parkmount my granddad grew radishes and my Belfast is the tart taste of those small purple cloves. So tell me, friend, what is it about Sandy Row that puts distance in our eyes? We're both fine-tuned to recognize the darkness.
