A SORT OF HUNGER

After the symphony of mowers and edgers they rise and brush the decay of thatch—as I would. And the robin, the blackbird, the jay descend hurriedly onto their lithe and brittle bodies—as I would.

Eulogia

Bury the ax; bury the bow saw; bury him who would split my son in two, old enemy of the wood. Let rust return to earth and vein the rose. Let the juniper spread red boughs. Let indifference fester, then feed.

for my father

