both vulnerable and stark against the landscape, the dull gloss of the bearable Texas heat.

Unsent Letter to Luis Salinas / Robert Mezey

It's hot in the mountains now even at night and soon you will be in Texas fighting the sun & looking for the virgin in Mexican bars.
Obsidian eyes that see the human and the inhuman with the same anguish, hands of broken wheat,
bones resonating to the grito, all the weariness of the poor burns clearly through raw alcohol.
I think of you pushing a heavy brown breast to your mouth as if you could get away for just one night or even twenty minutes.
A fiery planet flies around your heart and a moon around the planet and stars are shooting everywhere.
Your blood is amazed at all this activity, and the woman is amazed, and the bed creaks under the weight of the world.
May you have many children and the gringos none.

Lime Kiln / Daniel Halpern

Late August, the dead days of lime bleaching clay near the kiln at Big Sur. I move forward in shoes bleached by lime and sun, and in my face the stain of lime moving upon me.
