

György Somlyó · Hungary

WOUND AND KNIFE

The relationship between knife and wound is variable. The wound bleeds. The knife gets bloody. The wound aches. The knife gets notched. The wound remembers the knife in pain. The knife does not remember the wound. The wound heals. The knife's wound endures. One day the wound will also forget the knife. The knife has nothing to forget. The knife finds pleasure in the wound as in the opening of the body. The wound may also find pleasure in the knife as in a penetrating body. The wound abhors the knife. The knife may abhor the wound. There are some who abhor the wound. There are some who abhor the knife. Others abhor both. The wound may also like the knife. The knife may also like the wound. It may happen that the wound is as insensitive as the knife. Sooner or later the wound heals. The knife may break into the wound. The knife often says: I am the Wound. The wound may one day say: I am the Knife. The relationship between wound and knife is variable. Only one thing is invariable: that there are wounds and there are knives. The knife is the knife of the wound. The wound is the wound of the knife. One cannot exist without the other.

translated by Maria Korosy and William Jay Smith

FABLE OF FIRST PERSON

Between my nape and my hand this dialogue

This question and answer going on without interruption