

meet each other bent toward the same light they might discover they share a language, and in speaking it open the mouth of something they'll have to feed for years.
See how close and warm they sleep, though.
This is an old story, and people will pay to hear about it, this falling—call it waking, call it a long release—into love. It has to do with the storage of the heart, the hunger we're willing to risk on the outside chance of getting home.

PRODUCE

No mountains or ocean, but we had orchards in northwestern Ohio, roadside stands telling what time of summer: strawberries, corn, apples—and festivals to parade the crops, a Cherry Queen, Sauerkraut Dance.
Somebody'd block off a street in town, put up beer tents and a tilt-a-whirl.

Our first jobs were picking berries.
We'd ride out early in the back of a pickup—kids my age, and migrants, and old men we called bums in sour flannel shirts smash-stained with blueberries, blackberries, raspberries. Every fall we'd see them stumbling along the tracks, leaving town.

Vacationland, the signs said, from here to Lake Erie.
When relatives drove up we took them to see The Blue Hole, a fenced-in bottomless pit of water we paid to toss pennies into—or Prehistoric Forest, where, issued machine guns, we rode a toy train among life-size replicas of brontosaurus and triceratops.

In winter the bean field behind our house would freeze over, and I'd skate across it alone late evenings, sometimes tripping over stubble frozen above the ice.

In spring the fields turned up arrowheads, bones.
Those slow-plowing glaciers left it clean and flat here, scraping away or pushing underground what was before them.

NEXT-DOOR NEIGHBORS

Grant Street was one long Sunday afternoon in February or March, a few yards of brown grass thinning and matted or rubbed away hard.
Our house stayed dark with my mother's pleurisy, and it made me angry, the way she kept trying to raise herself up to clean rooms or fix supper.
Then she'd lie down again on the couch, covering herself tight with two blankets, chilling.
It was Sunday afternoon, foggy, and my father was playing his Hank Williams record.
He's dozing at the end of the couch, his hand on my mother's feet, and I go outside to sit on the porch. Mr. Carter from across the street pulls up grinning on his Harley and asks me if I want to take a ride, and I do, but I don't like his eyes, and besides I'm not allowed to, and shake my head no. I'm ten or eleven with a younger brother and sister somewhere, but my seeing is short-ranged and telescoped—cardboard taped into the Carters' front window, the busted taillight on our old white Comet, yesterday's Register, "The World At Your Doorstep."
