when the moon sits on top of the Santa Ritas then levitates becoming smaller and more pale as it goes I say I have given you nothing it was all I had

but you do not listen you go on into your losses without birds without mountains or shadows or the moon you look into yourself and say it is not enough it was never enough

New House / Diane Ackerman

We bought a house hand-me-down and complete, packed with all the gear family life engenders: cameras, clothing, junk and antiques, vibrator, bowling ball, pans and glasses.

Every knick-knack knows gossip I have no right to, about a Mr. Norton who lived, bred, and boozed there. I'm told he died of gluttony in middle age, towards the end bloating like a pufferfish. Now suddenly I've acquired someone's life, as if it were a fondue-pot or a hedge-cutter. His initial still rules the hall linoleum.

There are mortgages and taxes and a pool to skim daily, poison-ivy to uproot, grass to mow, doors to lock. And me with no steady job guaranteed.

Soon I'll leave the little garret I've spent five years in, groomed and combed and grown used to, where I bedded my lover and housed my jubilation, relaxed, fretted, and pined, grew used to. A roommate once had an afghan-hound with brown eyes like quicksand, and such long spindly legs it never could lie down right.

I used to watch the poor beautiful creature circle, fold and unfold and fold its legs again, trying, for all the world, just to settle.

The Song / Denis Johnson

The small, high wailing that envelops us here, distant, indistinct, yet, too, immediate, we take to be only the utterances of loose fan belts in the refrigerating system, or the shocked hum that issues from the darkness of telephone receivers; but it speaks to us so deeply we think it may well be the beseeching of the stars, the shameless weeping of coyotes
