

the dogs to sweep the fields up to the orchards though the authorities can guess he's beaten them to the shafts that haven't been used since the Civil War.
He knows full well they won't risk following him—the supports are rotted through, and those pockets of gas tend to shift suddenly—he'll forget what he's been taught about light.
He doesn't need to see the reporters forcing their way through the road block to know that they're screaming for action from the sheriff who's just taken off his hat and wiped the sweat from his forehead and turned away from his deputies who are shooting the pigs.

BLOODWORMS

My father hides in my blood and breathes air through a reed.
I have lost his scent. I cannot find him.

Is he in the crack in my spine? In the light behind my pupil?
I ride on horseback until the sun hurts my eyes;
it burns the backs of my hands.
I drink limewater from a metal canteen.
I pick the lining of his boots and plug my ears against the wind.
I search for pieces of his clothes among briars and weeds.

Like a pin, he has made himself small. He is in disguise;
he has wrapped himself in the skin of a doe. He chews the roots of my hair. He licks dew from leaves.

I can feel them—the worms—they are in my blood, gnawing a tunnel
through the fat in my veins.
They want to devour my heart. They listen to my father.
They swim like tiny needles underneath my skin.

I want to tear at my skull with the claw of a hammer. I want to expose my brain, like the flesh of a wound.

I bless the hands at the ends of my arms. I bless my feet and their precarious balance.
I kill rats as offerings
to the owls for my passage.
I carve my skin
into strips
and feed them to the birds. Try to deaden my senses with a burning wire.

I see the crows circling. I smell my father.
He lies half-frozen
at the edge of a clearing.
The roots embrace his dying body. Neither of us begs for forgiveness. His chest and legs are turning into wood.

I cut off my head and suspend it in burlap from a tree.
I shoot my horse in the stomach. I crawl inside it to keep warm.