

After the Ballet / Howard Moss

Saratoga Springs, July 4

Where do the dancers go after dancing,
The tumult of the action slowly fading,
Asterisk, bulb, and incandescent
Roman candle rushing into starlight?
Where do the watchers go after dancing,
The crowds of people dim in the stage light?
The rockets of celebration wildly
Flare for a moment, dangle, and darken.

Monogamy / Ira Sadoff

Imagine sleeping in the same bed with another woman. Any woman.
Think of losing sight of all perspective, the bed tilting over like an ocean liner, the horizon sliding out the window like a sheet of glass. What if your wife left you tomorrow? Who would you have to tell about your wonderful experience?
What if you never lose this need for sleep? All night you cannot speak—something is going on in everybody else's room tonight, the bedsprings heating up like coils on the stove, a whole way of life going up in a mattress. And you are there and there and there and there.

Odessa / M. R. Doty

The wheels the carts in Odessa are black the stones on the beach are black
