

MORNING

I've been having such thin dreams lately, like the knives', like slits in paper.

Waking exhausted, I see trees on the lawn
like nails
pounded in to hold things in one piece or arrows that fell

just missing the house.

SPELLS

You loved to feel
the fine hairs on my body
like delicate vines of dead ivy covering walls.

You fingered them as carefully
as a thief
toying with a tiny lock.

You said living with me
was like living with a dead man.

But let's not lie about it.
We met, with secret intentions,
like spies, or sorcerors.
We both lost something,
we both took something away.