

ON SORROW

The way certain people run through rain at rest stops, the quiet ones or the quick shrieking ones, is the way I want to think about sadness: brave flash and the weedy grass too shiny in such light, say, the middle of September which is always at a slant, the kids school-dogged, hitting every puddle, that slow motion rush from the car.

But it's the stranded ones there, old guys with caps, a woman with her hood up—I look at them and hardly think at all.
They stand whistling for their genius dogs, dogs who half-fly through the dog walk zone. Two notes to that whistling, or three.
Each has a rhythm I can't quite get.
They hunch down into their nylon jackets, shoulders already dark with rain.
I don't know what it is—just what you do if you have a dog, like it's raining all day, regardless.

Half the time, I sit a few minutes in my car before I do anything. One of them is always trying to light a cigarette in the rain. Match after soggy match flung down. This is hope.
