will “work.” What we can ask ourselves about this is what group therapists and chemical-dependency therapists teach their clients to ask themselves: How has it been working so far? Is the United States in a fair way to protect its foreign policy from further indecency and its domestic politics from further ravenous theft? Does our middle-class American feel entitled to be emotionally immature? psychologically chaotic? incapable of remembering history and incapable of recording his or her growth?

The next question is the hopeful one: if there are some techniques of intervening with the forces in people’s backgrounds so that heretofore cynical and childish consumers can become earnest and courteous philosophers, are we up for trying it?
