AUNT LAURA MOVES TOWARD THE OPEN GRAVE OF HER FATHER

You are coming toward us
As if you have done this Every day of your life.

You are stumbling. You are my Aunt, our ignorant, old fool And you are completely in Black. We are, to put it plain, Putting grandfather into A hole in the ground. We are Dry eyed as dry ice is cold.

We have made it clear to you How much you did wrong, how much Better we could have done al-Most anything. Except this.

This perfection. This grief.

You are in black. You are moving Toward us. You are wisdom,
The dark that stabs me at midnight

On any street because I Am who I am and we are violent At the horrible, hard gates of Paradise. You are an army Of crepe, onyx. Like the wind

You move curtains of sorrow,

Simplicity, toward us.
And I love you while Grandpa Slips now from our fingers for Ever and I take your hand
And we hold on together.

Joseph de Roche

---

GO BACK UP

The people sitting at the table with a child are parents, because of money everyone turns the fork over and the child yawns, dessert comes and the father takes a long swallow, but for the most part he keeps to himself, letters on the sideboard contain an occasional reference to the mother's illness, she asks the child to bathe and change for bed, gives the door one more look. The father shifts his legs, irritation changes to thoughtful dismay, my own son says when I tell him the story as long as he can see some branches through the window he knows the trees must be on the other side of the wall, there is grace in his voice now, we spend most of the night upstairs refilling the humidifier, sometimes we give up and rush him out to the damp air, there is juice for really bad coughing, rain is falling now thank the Lord, it's between fifty and sixty degrees, the parents turn toward their son, chat with their hands, there are puppets on them from Hungary.

---

Stuart Friebert