The Main Event

The bell has rung for the most controversial boxing match this town has seen since a cop slugged the Chief of Police and went on to become the Mayor of Iowa City. The fight over the local option sales tax could prove to be as dramatic a main event as the time a female fire fighter challenged the entire city administration & good ol' boys network.

Here's what happened in the opening rounds. The City Council appointed fifteen citizens to suggest ways for the city to cope with a projected budget deficit. Five of the citizens recommended that a sales tax be put before the voters; ten said that other options were more appropriate. The Council decided to place the sales tax on a county-wide ballot.

Now the skirmishing has intensified. The city manager, who maintained a veneer of professional neutrality during the Citizens' Committee meetings, is pitching the sales tax to every breakfast club and service group in town. The Johnson county Democrats have scheduled a forum for September 19. From Rossi's to the Athletic Club, from the Hills Bank to the Sutliff Tavern, the sales tax is the talk of the town.

In the pro sales tax corner:
- Five City Councillors. Unpredictable club fighters, known more for endurance than strategy. Recent sloppy performances probably due to lack of ring generalship. Inconsistent record, but entertaining style. Tendency to cave in under pressure.
- City Manager. Promising newcomer who previously fought in Illinois and Wisconsin. Reputed to be a clever tactician. Poised, bordering on cocky. Has yet to prove he can take a punch.
- Human Service Agencies. Exchamps who've seen better days. Desperate to remain contenders, willing to take chances in hopes of going the distance. Lack of confidence despite outstanding career and hometown popularity.

In the anti-sales tax corner:
• Two City Councillors. Weighed in with doubts about the motives of the fight’s promoters. Lodged protests over hasty planning and disregard for Citizens’ Committee’s preliminary decision. Good moves, but unable to combine punches effectively.
• Traditional Democrats. Once-potent sluggers, now thought to be on the ropes. Stubborn in the clinches, won’t quit until the final bell.
• Labor Unions. Old-fashioned style, sticks to fundamentals. Not much of a knock-out punch, but can jab sharply for a few rounds.
• The Press-Citizen. Unpopular lightweight, but occasionally connects with a good left.

Prairie Dog predicts ... a dogfight, with the sales tax camp scoring a narrow victory. Watch for taunts, low blows, and plenty of fancy footwork on both sides.

Myth: The sales tax has widespread support.
Fact: The sales tax has been opposed by the national and state platforms of the Democratic Party, by the Iowa Federation of Labor, by two-thirds of the Citizens’ Committee, by many local merchants fearing loss of trade and jobs, by the Press-Citizen, and by the voters of Cedar Rapids and Polk County.

Myth: A sales tax or a property tax increase are the only revenue options available to Iowa City.
Fact: The Citizens’ committee suggested at least a dozen alternatives to raise money or cut expenses. None have been pursued by the Council.

Myth: Our property taxes are too high.
Fact: Property tax per person in Iowa City $222
Property tax per person in Des Moines $276
Property tax per person in Cedar Rapids $301
Iowa City’s property tax rate is the lowest of the state’s eight largest cities. It’s the only city over 50,000 people with a property tax levy below the maximum set by the state. Property taxes could increase by a total of $800,000 and still be below the legal limit.

Myth: Students don’t pay enough for city services.
Fact: Students are facing a second consecutive year of large tuition hikes. These monies benefit the Iowa City community directly. They provide the cash flow which allows Iowa City to prosper. Furthermore, the large majority of UI students do not live in dorms but in premises subject to the property tax.

Myth: Iowa City will receive over $2 million if the local sales tax option is enacted.
Fact: No one knows what the take will be. Predicting sales revenue is a lot trickier than predicting property tax revenues, especially if retail sales are adversely affected by the local option tax.

Some of the sales tax money collected in Iowa City will be redistributed to neighboring communities. 100% of property taxes, wheel taxes, and franchise fees remain in the city which collects them.

REPORT FROM

Japan

WHEN Prime Minister Nakasone of Japan's ruling Liberal Democratic Party introduced sales tax legislation last year in the Diet, he didn't realize it would soon rank up there with some of his spectacular gaffes such as the comments on how Blacks and Puerto Ricans dragged down the intelligence level of Americans. Since the ultra conservative LDP leader had promised not to introduce any indirect taxes, he had quite an exercise trying to explain why it was necessary. At a time when he is attempting to increase domestic spending and rationalize a lower growth rate, his intellect wasn't quite up to the challenge and leads me to suspect reactionaries tend to lower a population's I.Q. In any case, the Japanese people, not having access to referendum, as Iowa City voters do, had to resort to letter-writing campaigns, demonstrations, lobbying by consumer groups and just general loud and vociferous complaints on the morning commuter trains.

Vowing to hold fast to this reprehensible tax that would have benefitted large companies in the distribution system and put an additional burden on the already heavily taxed salaried men & women consumers, it was designed to help support an ever-increasing military budget that has already surpassed the magic 1% of GNP level.

Because of the protests, though, the Liberal Democratic Party finally had to defer to the wisdom of the common people and withdraw the sales tax proposal this Spring.

Now I return to Iowa City to find the public library closed on Thursday nights and Fridays, and a proposed sales tax. Have the City Council Members of this progressive city slipped to the level of Nakasone? Is it connected to an Iowa City military budget? Is the pesticide level in the water responsible? I doubt if there can be any more justification for a sales tax here than in Japan. Here, as there, could it be that a reordering of priorities is needed?

Iowa City voters have direct recourse. You can vote "No" to the sales tax. We couldn't in Japan. We had to fall back on marches, leafletting and letter-writing. Granted, those activities are a lot of fun, but referendums are a whole lot simpler. Vote No.

Kubby Announces For Council

"We are here at the library because I am a big user and supporter of the public library. There have been many a Friday afternoon when I needed access to the library only to find it closed. It was very frustrating. I'm sure there are many of you here who have had similar experiences.

"My involvement with city politics since 1983 has made me appreciate how complex local government can be. In 1983 the city council appointed me to an ad-hoc committee to review sections of the Human Rights Ordinance. In 1984 the council appointed me to the Committee on Community Needs, or CCN.

"From my work as a member of CCN, I have gained skills in targeting and prioritizing community needs as well as critical skills in looking at a budget. This means learning to say no to non-priority budget items. From my experience as Chair of CCN, I have gained skills in keeping good relations between the committee and the current city council. I feel that I personally have a good working relationship with the current council and with city staff.

"We face a projected million dollar deficit this year. We need new councilwomen who have experience facing a budget. We need new councilwomen who will not just rubber stamp city staff recommendations. We need new councilwomen who can encourage economic development without compromising the quality of life we have established in Iowa City. We need new councilwomen who will fight to reopen the public library. We need outspoken, energetic council members who will work hard to make informed decisions and be responsible to all of the community."
