ON THE BACK COVER:

ANOTHER WHITMAN LETTER TO JEANNETTE GILDER—Jeannette Gilder (1849–1916) was the editor (until 1906) of The Critic, to which Whitman contributed a series of six articles, "How I Get Around at 60, and Take Notes," between 29 January 1881 and 15 July 1882. They were all rewritten for Specimen Days (1882) and appear in Floyd Stovall's edition of Whitman's Prose Works 1892 (New York: New York University Press, 1963); see 1:347–351. Most of the fifth article, in The Critic for 3 December 1881, appeared in Specimen Days as "A Visit, at the Last, to R. W. Emerson," "Other Concord Notions," and "Boston Common—More of Emerson" (now in Prose Works 1892, 1:278–282). In his Daybooks and Notebooks (New York: New York University Press, 1978), Whitman calls these reminiscences his "Emerson notes" and records sending them to The Critic on 16 November 1881; see 1:273. In this hitherto unpublished letter, from the Feinberg Collection-Library of Congress, dated 21 November [1881], he asks Miss Gilder to make corrections, to send him five sets of proofs, and then 10 copies of The Critic upon publication. And from the Daybooks, 1:272, we learn that these five copies went to William Michael Rossetti, Moncure D. Conway, and Herbert J. Bathgate in England; and to Mrs. Franklin B. Sanborn and Dr. Edward Emerson (Ralph Waldo Emerson's son) in this country.
