& Dan Campion

Introduction by Ed Folsom

Bibliographic chronology of works by poets about Walt Whitman unpublished)

456 pages, $20 (cloth,) $10 (paper)

In this comprehensive gathering of poems and essays, poets from Whitman's time to our own explore the continuing presence and pervasive influence of Walt Whitman.

"Wonderful in conception, masterly in execution. . . . This is a book to browse, to study, to cherish; for, as much as any book can, it lets the reader know who and what Whitman was and still is—a vital presence." —**Choice*

"An impressive group of contemporary poets (some writing in prose) pay vibrant, empathetic homage to Leaves of Grass, extending the already long bibliography, given here, of poems to and about Whitman. . . . If scarcity is eventually added to its quality and sparkle, this could become a collector's item."

—American Literature

"Whitman is still alive. . . . Just how alive becomes abundantly clear in Walt Whitman: The Measure of His Song. Folsom's long essay called 'Talking Back to Walt Whitman' is a superb piece of work. 'The temptation,' he writes, 'to talk back to Walt Whitman has always been great, and poets over the years have made something of a tradition of it.'" —Fred Cody, San Francisco Chronicle

"This book is both a labor of love and a model of craft and care. As a tribute to Whitman it is uniquely valuable; anyone who wants to know why Whitman matters would do well to begin here. . . ." —R. W. French, Walt Whitman Review

"This book makes a major contribution to Walt Whitman criticism and scholarship. On second thought, I'll call it colossal." —Gay Wilson Allen

My Dear Miss Gilder

Thanks for the slips of No. 2, which have duly come.
Also the paper — I believe I shall have to decline writing about Victor Hugo for you — don't know enough about him — (the article in to-day's Critic seems to me to have it about right) —

— I send you two more batches of Notes —

— I am going on to Boston middle of next week — return forthwith.

Walt Whitman

Send on the proofs as before — Have you ever thought of asking <sup>Life Saving Service Bureau</sup> Wm D. O'Connor of Washington, x to write for you?
